thanks to changes in tax policy and spending on infrastructure, according to a research note from Bank of America Merrill Lynch (BofAML). Among other factors, the bank says improvements in the policy for the mainland's first "fiscal decentralisation" will accelerate spending on telecom networks, such as 4G, fibre optic networks, and airwaves. China has pledged to cut red tape in a bid to boost the competitiveness of its telecoms and IT sector by spending more on infrastructure. But it has also promised to accelerate its shift from a centrally managed economy to one based on greater fiscal decentralisation, the change in which will see more cities and regions take responsibility for their own budgets. The business services sector in Shanghai will lead this year, the bank predicts, adding it is "likely" to post top-line growth of 6.9% this year, thanks to growth in services such as mobile payments, financial products, and social media. BofAML further notes that the Shanghai economy is "stronger than previously expected". The bank forecasts the economy will expand at a 5.9% rate this year, marking the third straight year of growth above 5% for the Chinese city. But a "further and more abrupt" slowdown in the economy is likely, with the bank predicting the mainland's gross domestic product will grow at 5.82157476af
